The author of this book further reveals the underlying value from the two perspectives of consistency and inconsistency. Consistent relationship between appeals and decisions in administrative litigation provides us with a major thread in constructing types of administrative appeals and decisions. The administrative litigation in China should set up three basic litigation types including discharging the action, affirming the action and action of performance. From the angle of inconsistency, the author analyzes scholarly opinions on several judicial decisions made out of court, such as maintaining the decision, remaking the decision, affirming legal and effective decisions, making judicial decisions based on circumstances and so on and further claims that the out-of-court judicial decision-making types in Chinese administrative litigation are justified for they correspond to the trait of objective law in maintaining order and the authority orientation in administrative litigation procedures, and can also meet the need to supervise administration, protect public interest, personal interest and adjust to administrative judicial practice. The author further discusses theoretical foundations and applications over this issue.
