I still remember like it was today, the first time I read the term “Titan” in a comic. At that time, it actually did not make any sense at all to me.

I was around six and I based my readings on Walt Disney characters and the “Corriere dei piccoli” (yes, I know, many years have passed; indeed, I lived my childhood in the 1970’s). So, I ran to my dad asking for the meaning of that weird word.

Shortly thereafter, I don’t know how, a book came up from a gorge in the library. At that time, its pages had already turned yellow. My father said: “Do you want to know something about Titans?” Then, suddenly, he started reading without giving me time to reply.

“They were immortal creatures, like Gods, but lacking in divine omnipotence. Titans were giants having a colossal height. The highest oak would barely touch their side with its branches, and, yet, they would easily split its trunk”.

These were the opening lines of the Chapter he read me that night long ago. That was the start of my journey through Myths and Legends from ancient past, that has not yet ended.

The aim of this book is to remind the youths, who often are mesmerised by computers and videogames, that dreaming is still possible. Like our ancestors did, sitting close to the fire and listening to an old, wise storyteller.

Being a storyteller is a very important vocation, and in ancient times, it was praiseworthy, whereas nowadays it is almost forgotten. In fact, in Ireland, that is one of the cradles of fairy-tales heritage of humankind, University funds researchers for going from town to town, fearing this treasure might get lost. They have to listen to the fairy tales told by the old men, and put them in writing, so that they could survive in the interest of future generations.

That said, I give some latitude to ‘ancient tales’ readings suitable for all ages. I hope that they may help parents spend time with their children, telling nice stories.

Yet, I hope reading help people rediscover that, ever since time began, men love to tell stories and also their own stories, and nowadays, we still owe that heritage. In the words of the famous scriptwriter Giancarlo Berardi: “Why should we keep on writing stories which come after Homer’s works and the Bible? Actually, we keep on writing those stories over again, adapting them to suit our sensitivity and the awareness of our times.”
